She desired his heart, but he'd given her that already. She asked for his mind, as well. He could work on that. But what kind of man was he to never have a body to give her, to never love her as she deserved?

Humiliation cloaked him, its scent worse than death. For death was final, the end of all things, but this uselessness he must live with and look her in the eye as well.

Harmon Ranger went off to war, a Confederate soldier full of bravado and courage. But two years later, minus his legs, he only wants to die.

He is half a man, now, and no man at all. There is no recovering from this.

Except his fiancé, Linnea Hewitt, says differently. There is life in what remains, she insists, and in her arms, the love he left behind.

A powerful short story of love and peace by best-selling author, SUZANNE D. WILLIAMS.

short and sweet

By Josephine

I liked the line about how rightness, or doing something right, brings peace. Shows some emotional pain of pregnancy out of wedlock.

Didn't Finish the Book

By Cyn Rogalski

An ongoing story about a year in the lives of two characters, he a soldier missing limbs from battle; she in love with him since before he went to war.

Both fighting physical desires.

Repetitive and boring...only got through 37% of the book.

short story

By j.r.

I enjoyed the story, but the author really needs to have someone proof her work before publishing. One of her sentences unintentionally decapitated a character by being grammatically unsound. This is a slice of life short. It spans about one year.
